Documentary filmmaker secures distribution

Taylor Golonka is a documentary filmmaker with two previous films already in circulation. The first, Green Guild, is a look into a medical marijuana dispensary in Los Angeles. The second, Homeless in Los Angeles, takes a critical look into the homeless problem in Los Angeles.

This latest film, Boogaloo Shrimp, is a biographical sketch of one of the founders of the 1980's dancing fad – breakdancing.

The film focuses on Michael Chambers, an original breakdancer and star of the movie, Breakin', a film about the breakdancing fad and fascination.

“One very important thing that people may not know about Michael Chambers is he is the person who introduces Michael Jackson’s signature move, ‘The Moonwalk’ to him. Chambers is the originator,” said Golonka.

Golonka has secured distribution rights with the distribution company Indie Rights out of Los Angeles. Founded by Linda Nelson and Michael Madison, the company prides itself on helping those entering the movie industry gain traction with their films.

Golonka knew this was the perfect company to handle distribution of Boogaloo Shrimp after learning about them via their webpage and within the independent movie community in Los Angeles.

“It is nice to have a company that focuses their attention on small, independent filmmakers and helps them reach maximum audiences across the U.S. and beyond. It is a strong hope that my film will catch on with those who at one time enjoyed breakdancing and the culture that went with it. I am sure there are plenty of Generation X’ers who will bust out the parachute pants when this film hits theaters,” said Golonka.

Boogaloo Shrimp has its own website at www.boogalooshrimp.com. Learn more about the distribution company at www.indierights.com.
